

Greater resilience, better care

A guide for adult social care managers to help them to reduce work-related stress and build the resilience of staff

www.skillsforcare.org.uk/GreaterResilience

Introduction

Working in care can be hugely rewarding, but it's also well recognised that it has the potential to be emotionally demanding. We know that supporting the wellbeing and resilience of our staff is vitally important to ensuring we offer a great service.

Catherine Robertson, Registered Manager

This guide is for managers in adult social care services, and individual employers, to support them to reduce work-related stress and build the resilience of their staff.

Stress is a significant cause of mental and physical ill-health, and can contribute to errors and misjudgements, low morale, sickness absence, burnout and high staff turnover – which all undermine quality care and support.

Being resilient will help staff to manage stressful situations, protect them from mental ill-health and improve their health and wellbeing. At work, this ensures that they continue to do their job well and deliver high-quality care and support.

It's not possible to take all of the stress out of care work, which is why it's important that everyone in adult social care is supported to develop their resilience, and that employers take steps to reduce work-related stress.

This guide explains what resilience is and why it matters, states your responsibilities as an employer, and shares how you can reduce work-related stress and develop the resilience of your staff.

It gives practical ideas and examples about how to ensure that your management systems reduce stress at work and support resilient behaviours, how to develop resilience through learning and development, and how to build a positive workplace culture that fosters and embeds resilience.

The guide will help you to think about what you currently do to reduce work-related stress and build resilience, and what you could improve.

Contents

Introduction	3
Contents	4
What is resilience?	5
■ What do we mean by resilience?	5
■ What does resilience look like?	5
■ Why does resilience matter?	6
Who's responsible for resilience?	7
■ Employer responsibilities	7
■ Employee responsibilities	8
■ The role of resilience	8
Developing resilience in your organisation	9
■ Management systems	10
■ Learning and development	13
■ Positive workplace culture	15
Information and resources to help	17

What is resilience?

What do we mean by resilience?

Simply put, resilience is the ability to cope under pressure and recover from difficulties.

A person who has good resilience copes well under pressure and can bounce back more quickly than someone whose resilience is less developed.

What does resilience look like?

There are some behaviours that are associated with resilience, for example:

- understanding and valuing the meaning of what you do
- greeting new situations, people and demands with a positive attitude
- doing what you can to get on with other people
- taking a problem-solving approach to difficulty
- keeping a sense of perspective when things go wrong
- being flexible and willing to adapt to change
- drawing on a range of strategies to cope with pressure
- recognising your thoughts and emotions, and managing them
- taking responsibility for your own behaviour, including mistakes
- asking for help when you need it
- being willing to persevere when the going gets tough
- recognising and respecting your own limits, including what you can control and what you can't.

The way that we behave is shaped by a range of factors, including personality and past experience, as well as current circumstances and the people around us. All of these things influence a person's resilience.

Everybody has resilience, but some people may have qualities that make them more resilient than others.

Here are some of the things that make a person resilient:

- confidence and self-belief
- feeling that what you do has meaning and value
- empathy and the ability to form positive relationships with others
- effective strategies to cope with pressure
- access to support.

These things can be developed and supported, therefore there's lots that you, as an employer, can do to build staff resilience.

Why does resilience matter?

Stress is a significant cause of mental and physical ill-health, and work-related stress is an issue in social care. Yes, care work is rewarding – we make a positive difference to people's lives – but it's also inherently stressful.

Stress can contribute to errors and misjudgements, low morale, sickness absence, burnout and high staff turnover – which all undermine quality care and support.

It's not possible to take all of the stress out of care work, which is why it's important that everyone in adult social care is supported to develop their resilience, and that employers take steps to reduce work-related stress.

Being resilient will help you and your workforce to manage stressful situations, protect you from mental ill-health and improve your health and wellbeing. At work, this ensures that you can continue to do your job well and deliver high-quality care and support.

People who are resilient benefit from better:

- job satisfaction
- personal development including greater self-awareness, better understanding of others and good self-management skills
- physical and mental health and wellbeing
- decision making skills.

For adult social care employers, this can lead to improved:

- performance and quality
- productivity
- team morale and team working
- retention.

All of this ensures that people receive the high-quality care and support that they need and deserve.

Workplace wellbeing tool (Gov.co.uk, 2013)

This tool will help employers to work out the costs of poor employee health to their organisation and create a business case for taking action.

www.gov.uk/government/publications/workplace-wellbeing-tool

Who's responsible for resilience?

Everyone has a responsibility for resilience.

Health and safety law requires employers and employees to take action on stress at work, which includes building resilience.

Employer responsibilities

Employers are responsible for the health, safety and welfare of all of their employees under the Health and Safety at Work Act 1974 and the Corporate Manslaughter and Homicide Act 2007.

This means making sure that employees and others are protected from anything that may cause harm, and that measures are taken to minimise any risks to injury or health.

Employers must assess the risk of stress-related ill health from work activities and take action to control that risk.

This includes:

- keeping up to date with good practice related to workplace stress
- monitoring indicators of stress-related illness, such as absenteeism, turnover, poor performance and conflict
- addressing workplace stress in health and safety policy
- carrying out regular risk assessments and acting on their findings
- addressing workplace stress, for example by building resilience.

Line managers play an important role in meeting these responsibilities, including:

- identifying, addressing and monitoring potential sources of workplace stress, for example through supervision with employees
- investigating whether performance issues are stress-related
- ensuring that resilient behaviours are put into practice.

Employee's also have a responsibility to take care of themselves, and others who are affected by their work activities, and to co-operate with their employers in meeting their legal obligations.

Employee responsibilities

Employee's also have a responsibility to take care of themselves, and others who are affected by their work activities, and to co-operate with their employers in meeting their legal obligations.

Employee's must:

- inform their employer if pressure at work is putting them, or anyone else, at risk of ill health
- be involved in assessing risks and suggest ways to reduce workplace stress
- undertake and follow training that their employer provides to support them
- discuss any reasonable adjustments that could be made to support them in the workplace
- tell their employer when safety measures aren't adequate or if something changes.

You can download our 'Building your own resilience, health and wellbeing' guide which is for anyone working in adult social care and explains how you can build your own resilience.

If you're an employee, it explains what resilience is and has practical tips and activities to help you to think about and build your own resilience.

If you're an employer or manager, you can signpost your staff to the guide to help them to build their own resilience.

Download your free copy from: www.skillsforcare.org.uk/BuildingResilience

The role of resilience

These health and safety responsibilities can, in part, be met by developing resilience. This guide explains some of the ways that employers can develop the resilience of their employees.

You can also download our 'Developing resilience in practice' guide, which shares examples and templates from adult social care employers about how they build and support the resilience of their staff.

Download your free copy from: www.skillsforcare.org.uk/ResiliencePractice

Developing resilience in your organisation

It is vitally important that organisations support their staff to put resilience strategies in place and promote a culture where people are encouraged to remain mentally well.

Sarah Evans, Head of HR and Learning and Development,
Care Management Group

This section of the guide explains some of the ways that you can reduce work-related stress and develop resilience, including:

- ensuring that your management systems prevent and reduce stress at work and support resilient behaviours
- using learning and development to support managers and staff to develop resilient behaviours
- building a positive workplace culture that fosters and embeds resilience.

The way that we behave is shaped by a range of factors, including personality and past experience, as well as current circumstances and the people around us. All of these things influence a person's resilience.

Here are some of the things that make a person resilient:

- confidence and self-belief
- feeling that what you do has meaning and value
- empathy and the ability to form positive relationships with others
- effective strategies to cope with pressure
- access to support.

These things can be developed and supported, therefore there's lots that you, as an employer, can do to build staff resilience.

Management systems

There are lots of ways that you can support resilience through your management systems, which include the policies, processes and procedures that guide how you do things in your workplace.

They should enable and support you to reduce work-related stress and build resilience, for example, by:

- organising work in a way that protects the wellbeing of your staff
- raising awareness of stress and how to manage it throughout the employment cycle
- ensuring that systems are in place to identify, investigate and resolve problems.

Ultimately, it's all about good people management. Here are some tips to help you to support resilience through management systems, including:

- values-based recruitment
- induction and on-boarding
- stress management
- learning and development
- organisational health and wellbeing initiatives.

Values-based recruitment

Values-based recruitment is an approach to recruitment that involves establishing strong workplace values and ensuring that your workforce matches them.

Recruiting individuals whose values align with those of your organisation makes it more likely that individuals will find their work meaningful and worthwhile – which supports resilient behaviours.

Induction and on-boarding

A thorough induction ensures that new staff are properly trained and integrated into your workplace. This helps individuals to feel confident, valued and supported in their new role – which supports resilient behaviours.

You could also include resilience training as part of the induction process.

Stress management

Effective stress management uses dialogue and consultation to address the six primary sources of stress at work - demands, control, support, relationships, role clarity and change.

It helps to ensure that pressures are manageable and that staff feel listened to and supported. The dialogue and consultation involved also offers staff valuable learning about stress and stress management.

Learning and development

Learning and development ensures that staff are confident and competent in their role - which supports resilient behaviours.

Staff can also do learning and development about resilience, to raise their awareness, improve their skills and learn the best ways to deal with the pressures of the role.

Ongoing support

Ongoing support can happen in lots of ways, for example supervision, appraisal, team meetings, on-the-job coaching, mentoring, behaviour modelling, peer learning, staff consultations, quality champions and recognition and reward schemes.

They give staff the opportunity to reflect on what's working and what isn't, discuss any issues, and identify areas for development.

They're a great way to engage staff in the meaning and purpose of what they're doing, which supports resilient behaviours.

Organisational health and wellbeing policies and initiatives

You might have policies that specifically support resilience, health and wellbeing, for example, a policy that explains what support staff can access if they're supporting someone at the end of their life.

Other policies should also support good mental health and wellbeing, for example, flexible working arrangements, support for carers and parental leave policies.

You might also have initiatives in place that promote health and wellbeing, such as cycle to work schemes, discounted gym membership, lunch time meditation or access to counselling.

These policies draw attention to the importance of resilience, health and wellbeing, and encourage resilient behaviours.

HSE Management Standards approach

The Health and Safety Executive (HSE) has developed a set of Management Standards to help employers tackle work-related stress. They demonstrate good practice through a step-by-step risk assessment approach and support employers to:

- assess their current situation
- identify the main risk factors
- explore the underlying causes of work-related stress
- promote discussions with employees to decide what practical improvements they need to make
- monitor progress, including indicators of stress-related illness such as absenteeism, turnover, conflict and poor performance
- address workplace stress when planning organisational change.

The Standards cover six primary sources of stress at work and help you to put processes in place to manage them.

The primary sources of stress are identified as:

- demands: this includes issues such as workload, work patterns and the work environment
- control: how much say the person has in the way that they do their work
- support: this includes the encouragement, sponsorship and resources provided by the organisation, line management and colleagues
- relationships: this includes promoting positive working to avoid conflict and dealing with unacceptable behaviour
- role: whether people understand their role within the organisation and whether the organisation ensures that they do not have conflicting roles
- change: how organisational change (large or small) is managed and communicated in the organisation.

These are the areas that 'if not properly managed, are associated with poor health and wellbeing, lower productivity and increased sickness absence'.

Find out more about the standards, including a free workbook and leaflets, at: www.hse.gov.uk/stress/standards/index.htm

If you choose to use a different approach to stress management, use HSE's 'Equivalency Checklist' to map your current approach against the standards.

Learning and development

Learning and development can equip staff with the skills, knowledge and values that underpin resilient behaviours.

Resilience is a behaviour, and is a product of people's:

attitude:
how you think about something skills:

your ability to do something knowledge:

your understanding of something

Therefore, learning and development can play a key role in developing resilience.

Learning aims

Any learning around resilience should achieve these three aims:

- ensure that staff understand the concept and value of resilience, so that they know what it is and why it matters
- help staff to learn about the values, skills and knowledge that underpin resilient behaviours, so that they know what it looks like in practice
- shows workers how to, and ensures that they, apply their learning in practice.

Learning topics

It might include learning around:

- dealing with pressure: for example, relaxation techniques, mindfulness, self-care and time management
- team working skills: for example, understanding the meaning of your work, communication skills and emotional intelligence
- problem solving and critical thinking skills: for example, the ability to use information, reflective practice and sources of support
- self-efficacy skills: for example, self-awareness and confidence building.

Learning around resilience doesn't need to be something new – it can easily be integrated into existing learning and development.

Any learning should focus on behaviour at work - you can't impact other influencing factors, such as personality, past experience and life outside of work, but you can define, model and change behaviour. It's also easier for people to behave resiliently if their colleagues are - behaviour rubs off, so if everyone around you is behaving in resilient ways, it's much easier for you to behave resiliently.

Reflective team learning

It's important that any learning is done together, as a team.

Behaviour at work is often a team behaviour, so it's important that people learn together so that everyone knows the correct and appropriate way to act and behave. It will also help you to embed resilient behaviours as 'the norm' in your workplace.

Reflective team learning is when staff engage in a collective discussion about the meaning of their practical, day-to-day work, and asks them to consider what they're doing and why. It's an opportunity to talk about work-related stress and resilience, as well as developing resilience behaviours such as:

- developing a shared understanding of what they do at work and why – this gives meaning to the work and makes everyone feel part of a team
- participating in team discussions and connecting with colleagues
- reflecting on their experiences and finding solutions.

Resilience-building programme

There are lots of opportunities to embed learning and development about resilience into your existing practice.

- Introduce the concept of resilience, i.e. what it is and why it matters, at induction.
- Reinforce understanding of resilience throughout the employment cycle, for example in supervision, appraisal, team meetings, coaching and mentoring.
- Embed resilience in management systems, such as policies, procedures, quality initiatives and leadership behaviours.
- Learning and development, for example, training, workshops, workplace coaching, mentoring, team discussion, critical reflection, peer learning and self-study.

It's important to reinforce resilient behaviours in everyday work-life. Simply reminding staff about the behaviours is a good prompt, for example, you could say: "And while we're on this topic, I just want to remind everyone what we learned about resilience because I think it's important here..."

It's also important to reward and/or praise staff who display resilient behaviours, for example, you could say: "I noted that you're doing [a resilient behaviour]. That makes a real difference to the service and our clients. I really appreciate it. Thank you."

Positive workplace culture

Workplace culture is an important part of managing work-related stress and promoting resilience.

One of the most famous definitions of workplace culture is ‘the way we do things around here’ (Bower, 1966).

Workplace culture is the character and personality of your workplace. It’s made up of the people and systems that interact within it.

Leaders and managers are responsible for creating and maintaining the right culture for their team.

In terms of resilience, they’re responsible for setting the culture, and leading by example by demonstrating resilient behaviours and reinforcing behaviours in staff.

What does a culture that fosters resilience look like?

A culture that fosters resilience includes staff being encouraged to:

- speak up and ask any questions
- talk about their feelings and any challenges that they’re facing, both in and out of work
- maintain composure during ‘emergencies’ and times of heightened stress
- seek out expertise rather than simply relying on another worker’s rank or seniority
- keep an eye on their work colleagues and offer support
- be able to express when there’s a need to switch to and from ‘emergency’ modes of operating.
- thank others for their help and discuss any other challenges.

Putting these strategies into place can help you to develop a resilient team and culture.

“My work is worthwhile. I’m part of a team that makes the world a better place for people. I feel respected and supported by the people around me, who I respect and support. Yes, there are pressures, but the support is there. Problems too, but we solve them. That is what makes the job interesting and rewarding. It gives me the chance to use my skills and to develop myself. All in all, I’m in a good place with my work and that helps me to feel good about life!”

Blame culture v learning culture

Blame culture

Negative workplace cultures are typically characterised by low trust, low involvement and management control, which promote stress, blame and fear, and does not support resilience.

Learning culture

Learning cultures are based on a collective problem-solving approach, which encourages collaboration, personal accountability and shared responsibility.

This deepens people's understanding, reinforces confidence, builds a shared sense of purpose and, ultimately, supports individual and collective resilience.

How to build a learning culture

Moving from a blame culture to a learning culture doesn't stop mistakes happening, but it does make it easier to put things right. It also means that staff feel supported, which can reduce work-related stress and develop their resilience.

Managers and leaders play a key role in embedding a learning culture.

This 70:20:10 model suggests that 70% of our learning happens informally in daily activities, 20% comes from the people around us and 10% from formal, structured learning. Therefore, everyday interactions between managers and staff are key to building a learning culture.

This could be simple things such as, next time something goes wrong, don't slip into blame mode – bite your tongue, breathe, relax and then take a different approach. First, reassure the people involved, for example, by saying "ok, what's happened has happened, now, let's deal with it together." Then involve them in solving the problem, for example by saying "please help me to understand what happened and what you think we should do about it."

Supporting informal learning

People learn best when they're encouraged to:

- think about what they're doing
- pay attention to what happens
- reflect on what they might do differently next time.

People will learn more if they're given the opportunity to:

- listen to, observe and work with others who have more expertise
- use their initiative to solve problems
- take on more challenging tasks.

People need confidence to:

- ask questions
- acknowledge mistakes
- act on their learning.

People need:

- time to think
- support to act
- feedback on results.

Information and resources to help

There is lots of information and resources about work-related stress and resilience online.

Type these questions into a search engine to find out more.

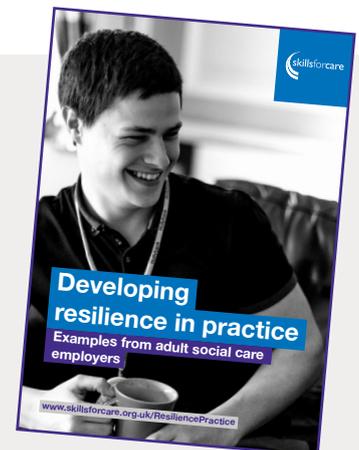

- What is resilience?
- What is resilience at work?
- Resilience and stress at work
- What are resilient behaviours?
- How can I become more resilient?
- How can I help my workforce to become more resilient?

We recommend you also read these Skills for Care resources. You can email us at marketing@skillsforcare.org.uk to request a printed pack of all three resources.

Developing resilience in practice

This guide shares examples of how other adult social care employers have developed the resilience of their workforce at an organisational and team level, and gives you example templates and resources that they've produced and used.

Download your free copy at www.skillsforcare.org.uk/ResiliencePractice.

Building your own health, resilience and wellbeing

This guide is for anyone working in adult social care and explains how they can build their own resilience. It shares practical tips and techniques to help you to manage stress and pressure at work, and has activities to help you to apply your learning to everyday practice.

Download your free copy at www.skillsforcare.org.uk/BuildingResilience.

Here are some other websites that you might find useful.

Health and Safety Executive
	www.hse.gov.uk/stress/ The HSE website has lots of information for employers about how to manage work-related stress. It has templates and examples around risk assessments, tackling stress and a talking toolkit. It also has posters about work-related stress which you can put up in your workplace.
CIPD
	www.cipd.co.uk/knowledge/culture/well-being The CIPD website has guidance, factsheets and podcasts about supporting mental health at work and developing resilience.
Mindful Employer
	www.mindfulemployer.net/ The Mindful Employer website brings together information about the law, good practice, training and organisations around mental health. There's also a charter that employers can sign to show their commitment to supporting mental health at work.
ACAS
	www.acas.org.uk/index.aspx?articleid=1900 The ACAS website has information about supporting mental health in the workplace, including how to manage staff who are experiencing mental ill-health.
Business Balls
	www.businessballs.com/self-management/stress-and-stress-management/ The Business Balls website explains more about stress at work, and shares stress management and reduction techniques. recruit develop lead

twitter.com/skillsforcare

facebook.com/skillsforcare

linkedin.com/company/skills-for-care

Skills for Care
West Gate
6 Grace Street
Leeds
LS1 2RP

T: 0113 245 1716
E: info@skillsforcare.org.uk

skillsforcare.org.uk